How Are Ethics Commissioners Appointed?

Established in 1968, the Hawaii State Ethics Commission is the oldest state ethics commission in the country. Its members have included educators, members of the clergy, doctors, attorneys, business executives, community service volunteers, retired government employees, and other distinguished citizens.

The Hawaii State Constitution requires that ethics commissioners be selected in a manner which assures their independence and impartiality. Appointments to the State Ethics Commission begin with the Judicial Council of the Hawaii Supreme Court. The Judicial Council nominates two individuals for each vacancy on the five-member Commission. The nominees' names are submitted to the Governor, who has sixty days to select one of the nominees for appointment. Senate confirmation is not required. Each member's term is four years. Individuals may be appointed to no more than two consecutive terms on the Commission.

Every member of the Commission must be a U.S. citizen and a resident of Hawaii. Members may hold no other public office. Members may not take an active part in political management or in political campaigns during their term of office. Members receive no compensation for their service on the Commission.

Sales of Craft Supplies and Fish in State Office Lead to Ethics Charges

The Hawaii State Ethics Commission issued a charge against a state employee who operated a private business that made and sold crafts. The charge alleged that the employee used state time, equipment, facilities, and state personnel for her private business activities. According to the charge, the employee made crafts for craft sales in her state office during state time and sold craft supplies to other state agency employees at work during state time. The charge also alleged that the employee was assisted in her private business activities at work by a co-worker, who delivered craft supplies to other employees at their state offices.

The charge also alleged that the employee used state resources to help sell fish to other employees at work. A commercial fisherman, who once worked in the same office, delivered the fish to the office in a cooler. The charge alleged that the employee notified other employees when fish was for sale in the office and collected money from employees who purchased fish.

The employee responded to the charge through her private attorney. The employee generally admitted to the allegations in the charge and agreed to pay $500 in restitution to the State of Hawaii. The employee's business activities at work ceased. Steps were taken to ensure that no private business activities were conducted at the employee's agency and that employees were made aware of the requirements of the State Ethics Code.

In light of the employee's admission to the charge, payment of restitution, and cooperation during the investigation, the Commission decided that further proceedings against the employee were not warranted. This case is discussed in Informal Advisory Opinion No. 2004-16, which is posted on the Commission's web site.

The Commission also issued a charge against the employee's co-worker, alleging that the co-worker used state time and state facilities to make crafts for private sale and make private sales deliveries of craft supplies. The co-worker paid $100 in restitution to the State, which the Commission viewed as the co-worker's acceptance of responsibility for her conduct. This case is discussed in Informal Advisory Opinion No. 2004-17, which also is posted on the Commission's web site.
