The people of Hawaii believe that public officers and employees must exhibit the highest standards of ethical conduct and that these standards come from the personal integrity of each individual in government.”

Gifts to State Employees During the Pandemic

Many state employees have been working hard to keep government operations running during the COVID-19 pandemic. Some employees, such as state healthcare workers, have been on the front lines battling the virus. In appreciation, businesses and others in the community have offered employees gifts of food and other tokens of appreciation.

All state employees are subject to the State Ethics Code, which prohibits employees from accepting many kinds of gifts. The State Ethics Commission looks at three factors to determine whether a gift can be accepted: (1) the relationship between the donor and the employee receiving the gift; (2) the value of the gift; and (3) whether the State will benefit from the gift.

Here are some general gifts guidelines for employees:

- It is generally okay for state agencies to accept donations of personal protective equipment or other equipment or supplies from private donors. These are considered gifts to the State – not to individual employees – and are not prohibited by the Ethics Code. Once accepted, these gifts become state property and must be used or distributed in accordance with applicable state policies.

- It is generally okay for healthcare workers, teachers, and similar kinds of service providers to accept small, unsolicited gifts of appreciation — such as cookies or malasadas – from patients, their families, or community members. However:
  - It is generally NOT okay to accept gifts from vendors or contractors, or from someone who is licensed, regulated, or inspected by an employee’s state agency.
  - It is generally NOT okay to accept cash or gift cards.
  - It is generally NOT okay to ask for a gift.

We get a lot of questions about gifts. If someone offers you a gift, and you don’t know if you can accept it, please call our advice line at 587-0460.

Also, if someone offers you a gift, you can always do the following:

- You can politely decline the gift: tell the person that you sincerely appreciate the gesture, but that state ethics rules don’t allow you to accept gifts for doing your state job; or
- If you can’t say “no,” you can take the gift and donate it to a non-profit organization (like a homeless shelter or a food pantry).

The COVID-19 pandemic has sparked a demand for face masks and other pandemic-related products. Some employees may be making or offering these products for sale to others. The State Ethics Code does not prohibit employees from having outside businesses, but it does prohibit employees from using their state positions or state resources for their private business activities.

Here are some general ethics guidelines for employees about private business activities:

- Do not use your state position to promote your private business.
- Do not advertise or take orders for private sales at work.
- Do not conduct private business during state work time.
- Do not use your state office or equipment (including your state computer or state e-mail) for private business.
- Do not solicit private business from anyone you supervise or regulate as a state employee.

For additional information, read the State Ethics Commission’s Quick Guide on Second Jobs and Other Private Business Activities. And contact the Commission’s office if you have any questions about how the ethics laws apply to private business activities by state employees.

State employees who are considering donation drives or fundraising activities in their offices to help others in need during the pandemic are encouraged to contact the State Ethics Commission’s office for ethics guidance. We understand that these activities come with the best intentions, but they may unintentionally raise ethics questions about the use of state resources for private business purposes (which includes fundraising for private charities) and possible pressure by the State upon others to make donations. In cases where there may be a problem, we can sometimes assist by suggesting alternative steps to avoid these ethics questions or concerns. Please contact us for quick, confidential ethics guidance – we’re here to help!
Due to health concerns about the COVID-19 virus, the State Ethics Commission has temporarily suspended its in-person ethics training classes. However, employees on all islands can still obtain ethics training by taking the Commission’s online ethics training program. The online program only takes about thirty minutes and is available here.
